Manager Commentary

November saw buoyant stock markets and Donald Trump’s decisive victory in the U.S. presidential election. Markets rallied on optimism surrounding pro-business policies, with equities hitting new highs and cryptocurrencies advancing. Surprisingly, U.S. Treasury yields fell from 4.4% to 4.2%, defying inflationary expectations. The dollar index surged and ended the month around 107 slightly below the high of the month of 108, as geopolitical tensions eased, including a Lebanon ceasefire and hopes for U.S.-Russia compromise on Ukraine.

A second Trump presidency signals deregulation, onshoring, and economic growth, with bold targets like 3% real GDP growth and energy expansion. Key reforms in immigration and healthcare, led by prominent loyalists, promise dramatic policy shifts. Mr Scott Bessent, the proposed Treasury Secretary, will target a “3-3-3” policy; 3% real GDP growth, 3 million more barrels of oil production per day and a 3% budget deficit – which the markets have certainly initially applauded. However, once in the office, we will gauge the implementation of such policies. We are cognizant of the debt servicing costs and issuance policy changes that may come with the new administration.

At home the economic outlook appears bleak. Inflation rose to 2.3%, GDP growth slowed to 0.1%, and private sector output shrank for the first time in a year. Chancellor Rachel Reeves’s borrowing plans and higher employer costs have triggered job cuts and stalled expansions, while green policies forced major factory closures. Bond yields hit 4.53%, reflecting investor concerns. Labour’s growth ambitions have struggled, prompting caution on increasing UK allocations at this time.

Europe’s outlook remains mixed, with weak industrial performance (e.g., VW profits down 64%) and rising unemployment. Bright spots include Novo Nordisk in pharma and Siemens Energy, outperforming Nvidia on energy infrastructure demand. Japan’s stock market has performed well, but future growth may slow as the yen weakens and the BOJ balances inflation, currency, and growth. China’s modest stimulus struggles to revive its economy, with limited benefits to equities. Emerging markets face challenges from dollar strength. Gold steadied at $2,600, while Bitcoin surged toward $100,000. Copper remains subdued, reflecting weak global demand evidenced by the Global Manufacturing PMIs, while uranium prices diverge from energy equities.

November saw strong performance in US small and mid-cap funds, nearing double-digit returns, followed by tech funds. Clean energy funds posted gains, while European equity funds struggled during the month.

In November, we trimmed Japanese equities after meeting targets, reallocating to cash. Portfolios performed well, anticipating 2025 growth under supportive U.S. policies. Positioned cautiously amid optimistic equity valuations.
